Liberty Baptist Church

The pastor will return Friday night from Princeton University after a week of study there. A layman, Mr. Franklin Vaughan, a former member of this church, will lead the Sunday night services. The pastor will be in a revival at New Chapel Church. Several from the church are attending WMU Week at Eagle Eyrie.

The Brotherhood will meet Saturday night (July 13) a time passonage. All men of the church are urged to be present. A good program is planned. Watermelon will be served.

Seventh-day Adventist Church

The overall subject for the Sabbath School lessons for the third quarter is "Lessons for Today From the Minor Prophets".

There has been no attempt to cover all the writings of the minor prophets instead, lessons have been planned, that should prove helpful to all people, if heeded.

Lesson Titles Listed — God's Vineyard, 2. Hosea—The Prophet of Love, 3. Joel —The Prophet of the Day of the Lord, 4.Amos—The Layman Prophet, 5. Obadiah — The Prophet of Doom, 6.Jonah — The Reluctant Prophet, 7 Micah — The Prophet to the Remnant, 8 Nahum — Prophet of Consolation to the Oppressed, 9. Habakkuk — Prophet of Faith, 10. Proclaimer of the Day of the Lord, 11 Haggai — Prophet of Courage, Action and Victory. 12. Zechariak — Prophet of Glorious — Possibilities 13 Malachi — Prophet to a Self -Righteous People.

Today as in days of old, God is gathering out of every kindred, tongue and nation, a people who will serve him whole heartedly. They should learn to avoid the blunders of ancient Isreal that they may succeed where they failed and finish the task assigned them and be prepared to met Jesus when he comes. Thus we should study the minor prophets not merely as books of history, but as divinely records preserved for our admonition upon whom the ends of the world are come". 1 Cor. 10:11.

Only this may these prophetic messages be instrumental in guiding us and in helping us to prepare for that Great Day. Please read Rev. 14: 6-12 and Malachi 3:16-17 Such precious promises written for the faithful and obedient.

Summer tomato growers, who have been asking tomato plants be staked? H. Scott of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute horticulture department.

In one of those cases, you pay your money and take your choice," he says. "You cannot get as many fruits from a staked vine as from unstaked one. However, staked plants are generally grown together so you produce more tomatoes per foot of garden area.

Unstaked tomato plants sometimes have fruit that is a smaller, of somewhat better quality and with no soil rot. Usually cleaner, and it is easier to spray the plants and get full coverage.

On the other hand, with staked tomatoes you are likely too have more cracking, blossom - end rot, and sunscald. Also, considerably more labor must be used to stake the tomatoes.

If you choose to stake your tomatoes, don't tie the material tight around the stem as itwill cause injury, says Scott. Staked tomatoes must also be pruned.

Prune them so that no more than one to three main stems are left to develop. A light foliage variety such as Valiant may need three stems, but a heavy vined plant such as Rutgers (and some hybrids) may need only one main stem.

Pruning is done by breaking off the shoots at the axils of the leaves. These are the a...oots that grow from the crotch made by the leaf branch and the main stem. It is better to break the shoots than to cut them off with a knife. The knife blade may distribute disease. Remove the shoots when they are very small —not over an inch long — as the pruning at this time will do little injury to the plants.

Tying staked tomato plants should continue throughout the growing season. Toward the end of the season a tomato plant will generally grow beyond the top of a stake which is about five feet high. Some gardeners pinch out the top of the plant when it grows to the top of the stake, others,

ABOUT BULLS

The cattle business, like all other agricultural enterprises is extremely competitive, says Curtis Mast, cattle specialist at Virginia Polytechnic Institute. The bee' cow business has increased steadily since 1940. It is constantly becoming more intensive and demanding more management decisions.

Mast says the time has passed when one could turn out a bunch of cows and expect them to look out for themselves. It is now necessary for cattlemen to strive to average 500 pounds of calf per cow bred and to do a marketing job that will insure receiving well over $100 income per cow.

To average 500 pounds of good quality calf per cow, the breeder must constantly be thinking ahead and making decisions and carrying out those decisions at the proper time to achieve his goals. It is no longer enough to have a pasture full of grass, a herd of cows and a bull, and a strong back.

Since the bull represents half the herd, just what is a good bull? Mast says to start with, he must have good beef conformation. Good thickness is essential, because this is really the difference between beef and dairy cattle. Lots of bone, heavy muscling, and plenty of ruggedness are qualities generally looked for. Never forget quality, because Virginia has built a reputation on quality cattle.

Quality sets the price per pound and this is multiplied by the pounds taken to market. It can't be said that quality or growth is more important than the other, because either by itself will not pay the bills in this competitive age. So, select a bull which has considerable growth.

The ideal bull is one which will grade fancy when he is seven moolhs old, weigh 600 pounds running with his mother on good pasture. He should weigh 1,000 pounds at 12 months of age on full feed.

This kind of bull is hard to find and Mast advises, 'when you do see one buy him and take him home.' Perhaps only two percent of the bulls at present can reach this ideal qualification.

The ability to grow, after the calf is weaned in the feedlot. is very important, becaus e this gives assurance calves sired by the bull will have the ability to do well for the person buying the calf crop.

"Bucky" Taken To Cumberland

"Bucky", the fawn, who captured his share of affection and attention while in Appomattox, has been taken to the Cumberland county game preserve. Richard D. Robinson, funeral director, who has been taking care of the little animal since it was rescued after its mother was killed by an automobile June 25, has reported that regulations require that wild animals be cared for at the game preserve. Later on, when "Bucky" is full grown, he can be returned to Robinson for release into the wooded area where he was found, or some other suitable section.

Why, I w'n't be without it!". He says he has been to Richwood, W. Va., and that it is a town about the size of Appomattox, not far from the Virginia line. Whenever you find a weekly paper in a town of about 1,200 population, with a paid circulation of over 10,000, at a good price, you can be sure it means that people from all over are subscribers to see just what Jim Comstock will write next! I'll be mentioning Jim again — would do it now, but this column is too long already.
